Statue remembers fallen heroes

Story by Spc. Benjamin Kibbey
FORWARD OPERATING BASE, Tikrit, Iraq – When he was forced to fashion statues of Saddam Hussein on horseback, the Iraqi sculptor had no idea that someday he would create a memorial for American soldiers.

The two original statues, which adorned a gate at the palace complex where 4th ID's headquarters group is located, were removed with explosives in early July, said 1st Sgt. Mark Anderson, the Headquarters and Headquarters Company first sergeant and Roseland, La. native. Anderson has monitored the project's progress since the end of July.

The toppled statues were cut up into pieces by members of the 555th Engineer Group and spirited quietly to the artist, Kalat, who reshaped the chunks of bronze into the likeness of an American soldier being comforted by a small girl as he mourns a fallen comrade.

In July, 1st Sgt. Glen Simpson, former HHC first sergeant, knelt for the picture that has become an immortal portrait in bronze, said Sgt. Maj. Chuck Fuss, the division sergeant major who resides in Killeen, Texas.

The artist, who fears retaliation from former regime loyalists for his work with the Coalition, spent several months sculpting and casting the statue. Though he created the two statues of Saddam along with another artist, he created the 4th ID memorial through his own design, said Anderson.

The sculpture is based on a scene many in Iraq have witnessed in one form or another. A soldier kneels before a memorial of boots, rifle and helmet – his forehead resting in the hollow of his hand. Behind his right stands a small Iraqi girl with her hand reaching out to touch his shoulder.

eyes and presence, a sympathy mixed with gratitude. She was added to remind people of why the sacrifice was made, Fuss said.

“It’s about freedom for this country, but it’s also about the children who will grow up in a free society,” he said.

Sitting in a former palace of Saddam now, the statue will return to Fort Hood ahead of 4th ID returning home, where it will become part of a larger memorial project at the 4th Infantry Division Museum. There, plaques will be hung in memory of those Task Force Ironhorse soldiers who have given their lives in Iraq.

The memorial planned for the Fort Hood museum is projected to cost between $30,000 and $40,000, and is scheduled to be completed July 2004. It is being paid for partly through donations from soldiers of Task Force

Riding convoy: Arrowhead Brigade enters Iraq

Story by Sgt. Jeremy Heckler

DULUIYAH, Iraq – It was early morning when the first soldiers climbed into their vehicles and began the long drive north toward an unseen enemy.

The 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, known as the Arrowhead Brigade, is the Army's version of a lighter, quicker element that is designed to be more mobile on the evolving battlefield. Employing that mobility, the unit crossed the Kuwait-Iraq border Dec. 3 in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom. The first waves began arriving two days later north of Baghdad, where they immediately began setting up operations.

For many of the soldiers, the convoy provided them with their first adventure.

Several Stryker combat vehicles rode with each convoy, ready to pounce on any opposition. Behind the Strykers, each vehicle carried troops armed with weapons and a determination to arrive unscathed.

Prior to leaving Camp Udairi, Kuwait, each convoy received training on how to handle a variety of situations, from identifying an improvised explosive device to dealing with being fired on by the enemy.

"Being on the turret I was freezing and I didn't think I'd make it, but I thought if I give up then I couldn't be there to stop an IED attack," said Sgt.

The next morning, each convoy rolled out and headed to their final destination, watchful of IEDs hidden in roadkill or debris.

As the units rode onward, they stopped one last time, assured that they were close to the safety of their new operating base.

"I'm just exhausted and ready to bed down so tomorrow we can get up and keep on trucking," said Sgt. Carlos York, a member of Distribution Company, 299th Battalion.

Operation Bayonet Lightning sweeps Iraqi city of insurgents, weapons

Story by Spc. Brandon Aird

AL HAWIJA, Iraq —With lights out and night vision goggles on, a convoy of more than 1,000 soldiers slipped into Al Hawija, Iraq under the concealment of a morning fog Dec. 2.

By the time the sun showed two hours later, the whole city had been surrounded, tactical checkpoints had been set up and soldiers were conducting searches of individual homes.

Part of Operation Bayonet Lightning, the soldiers' mission was to flush out insurgents, weapons, materials, or any information posing a threat against Coalition forces in this region of Task Force Ironhorse.

Searches require persistence

Story by Sgt. 1st Class Todd Oliver
AL HAWIJA, Iraq – When it comes to the delicate process of extracting vital information from local residents, 1st Sgt. Toby Boland, the C Company first sergeant, 1st Battalion, 508th Airborne Infantry Regiment, has a style all his own.

As the predawn fog lifts over the small, troublesome city of Al Hawija, Operation Bayonet Lightning is well underway.

The mission, which included almost all the paratroopers from the 173rd Airborne Brigade, netted more than 50 detainees, several confiscated automatic weapons, three improvised explosive device making kits and a large cache of rocket-propelled grenades.

Hours before, these men had searched a house looking for a senior Ba'ath party member. It was one of many houses they searched that day.

The battalion commander, Lt. Col. Timothy McGuire, jokes about the first sergeant's search techniques.

"I call him Colombo," he laughed, playfully punching the first sergeant, who, along with his men, was responsible for the capture of one of Saddam Hussein's senior bodyguards some weeks back.

Armored Personnel Carriers.

Al Hawija has been a hotbed for enemy activity since the Brigade and 4th ID arrived in the region. In recent months a string of improvised explosive devices and rocket propelled grenade attacks on the road leading from Kirkuk to Al Hawija has put numerous soldiers out of action.

Though all three battalions have had soldiers wounded or killed in Al Hawija and its surrounding areas, soldiers appeared to remain respectful of those residents they encountered.

Paratroopers of C Company, 2nd Battalion, even went as far as to wipe the mud off their boots and inform residents what they were searching for before entering homes.

“Were not here to kick innocent people’s doors down and scare them to death,” said Sgt. William Higginbotham III, a squad leader with C Company. “Were not going to let down on security, but if you’re respectful to residents, they’ll respect you.”

Higginbotham’s theory paid off in the first house he searched. Before entering the home, the sergeant had his interpreter explain to the resident that all the soldiers wanted were illegal weapons.

The homeowner led Higginbotham and a few members of his squad into a back room where he pulled out a new AK-47 assault rifle hidden under a floorboard. Higginbotham’s squad continued their search for weapons with a few more residents turning over weapons without a search. Another AK-47 was discovered in a bag buried in a dirt mound inside an abandoned lot.

“When we found the AK we got a call over the radio that 508th found eight rocket propelled grenade launchers buried in someone’s front yard,” said Sgt. 1st Class Danny G. Boivin, a platoon leader in C

Company. “So I had the squad (Higginbotham’s squad) continue searching the lot.”

A few yards away from where the AK-47 was buried another large bag hidden under some old tires contained an AK-47 and MP-5 magazines loaded with new ammunition.

Working by flashlight, 1st Sgt. Toby Boland, C Company, 1st Battalion, 508th Infantry, searches for documents in the home of a suspected Ba’ath Party member during Operation Bayonet Lightning.

Also inside that bag, the soldiers discovered a cardboard box containing 2.5 million in new Iraqi dinars, which is equivalent to about $1,250 in U.S. currency, or about 18 months pay for the average Iraqi. A man living next door claimed the money, but not the weapon.

Capt. Arie Richards, C Company’s commander, arrived on the scene and told the translator to tell the man he knew he was lying and if he didn’t start telling the truth he was going to jail. The man admitted he buried the weapon, magazines and the money when he saw American troops because he was afraid they’d steal his money.

“Were not here to take your money,” Richards told the man. “But we can’t let you keep the AK-47 and ammo.”

The money was returned to the surprised man, but the weapon and ammunition were confiscated and removed.

After C Company’s area was searched and cleared, they waited for the rest of the battalion in the rain, then started the long convoy back to their home base in Kirkuk.

“The mission ended up being a complete success,” said 1st Sgt. Michael Stribiling, first sergeant of A Company, 1-508th. “My company alone nabbed one person of interest. We also had a guy walk up and give us a book listing over 200 Ba’ath Party Officials. That was a massive find and I’m pretty sure it made the Colonel’s (Col. William Mayville, commander of 173rd) day.”

AWOL carries heavy consequences

Story by Spc. Melissa Walther

FORWARD OPERATING BASE IRONHORSE, TIKRIT, Iraq – To many people, two weeks of leave spent with friends and family comes as a welcome vacation from the daily routine of a deployed soldier.

However, those two weeks can seem far too short a time for some soldiers who fail to return to duty on time. That is when the term ‘absent without leave’ can cast a pall over a soldier’s career.

“There are various kinds of AWOL,” said Maj. Lorraine Rowbo, the chief of Military Justice for 4th Infantry Division and a Harker Heights, Texas resident. “If you miss a formation or are late to work it’s called failure to report. If you’re gone for a day or more, it’s AWOL, and if it’s longer than 30 days you’re dropped from the rolls and a desertion warrant is issued for your arrest.”

The consequences of taking a few extra days of leave without a valid excuse can result in criminal charges being filed, loss of pay, rank and other military benefits, said Rowbo. Some instances can result in a court-martial and a less-than-honorable discharge. Jail time is also a possibility.

“If a soldier goes AWOL, he can return voluntarily or be apprehended,” said Rowbo.

“Being apprehended is an aggravating circumstance and can result in pre-trial confinement.”

By going AWOL, a soldier becomes a wanted criminal and agencies such as the state and local police, military police and even the FBI are alerted.

“It’s one of the most common offenses in the military and one that is unlike anything in the civilian world,” Rowbo said. “If you show up late to work or miss a day you might get fired, but you won’t go to jail. It’s very important to maintain military discipline.”

A common time when soldiers risk going AWOL is following emergency leave.

“Soldiers are already home dealing with problems and a lot of times need more time,” Rowbo said. “Every soldier is told that if they have any problems to call their commander or chain of command and request extra time.”

According to Rowbo, someone found guilty of being AWOL during wartime situation is a serious situation with serious penalties. Those found guilty can face a sentence of up to 18 months of confinement, while those found guilty of desertion can face far more serious consequences.

If the desertion is during a time of war, according to Article 85 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice the most severe penalty is death.

“So far, we haven’t had a real problem with it,” Rowbo said, referring to units assigned to Task Force Ironhorse. “We’ve been really happy that there is such a small percentage of soldiers who go AWOL on mid-tour leave.”

Boland is tall with a sharp sense of humor. He has an easy-going swagger and sings constantly. It’s this demeanor that makes him seem less intimidating.

Today, he needs all his skills. Outside, in the small courtyard, five women and more than half-dozen children are seated on lawn furniture while Boland’s men search a house. He inquires about an Iraqi infant.

“Does the baby need anything?” Boland asks through an interpreter. He’s the father of two girls and a boy himself.

“You have to be a bit of a detective,” Boland said. “There are only two rules here - how many rooms are there with male clothing in them, and how many males does the family say are living there. Look at the photos. Is there anyone that should obviously be in the house but isn’t? Ask the same question of different people in separate places and compare the answers with them.”

Then, having separated one of the boys from the pack, he’s back to business.

“Are there any weapons in the house?” Boland asks. “Where does your family hide their rifle? It’s okay, everyone is allowed to have one in their house and we want to make sure there is only one.”

Boland squats down to the level one of the boys so they are both eye to eye and removes his Kevlar helmet. He does his best not to come across too harsh.

In the end not much is discovered. An AK-47 and several magazines of ammunition is found. It’s a lackluster ending to a grueling process, but as Boland would say, it’s part of the job.

Ohio reservists take care of the dirty work

Story by Staff Sgt. David Bennett

LOGISTICS SUPPLY AREA ANACONDA, Iraq – The old adage ‘An army travels on its stomach’ has been expanded in recent time to include a hot shower and a clean uniform.

Bearing this in mind, the members of 1001st Quartermaster Company, an Army Reserve unit based in Chillicothe, Ohio, have been busy doing the dirty work keeping soldiers assigned to Logistics Supply Area Anaconda clean and tailored.

At peak periods the quartermaster unit handles an average load of 14,000 pieces of laundry per week.

“We were handling the bulk for whole entire base,” said Spc. Paul Calhoun, a laundry, bath and renovation specialist from Columbus, Ohio.

The 1001st also runs the camp’s sole military sewing shop, plus numerous shower points. Besides their regular responsibilities, the reservists provide other needed services in the Task Force Ironhorse area such as convoy escort.

water, extending into renovations where the Ohioans sew uniforms, plus any other item soldiers may require, according to Sgt. 1st Class Andrew J. Kruger, a Green Bay, Wis. native who is charge of the renovations shop.

“We repair Humvee seat covers, make dust covers for equipment,” he said. “We can pretty much do it all.”

Having arrived in theater in April, the reservists are looking forward to the time when they will return to Ohio again. For now, they continue to support the troops the best they can.

“It looks like we’re doing something simple – laundry, shower, or sewing, but the soldiers highly appreciate it,” Calhoun said.

last three months since a civilian company set up shop at LSA Anaconda. However, with more than 17,000 soldiers based here, there is plenty of work to go around.

“We’re starting to get more business in the mornings because we have heaters in the showers,” said Sgt. 1st Class Michael Hair, first sergeant for the 1001st.

Ironhorse, said Fuss. There is also an ongoing effort by the 4th Infantry Division Association of Fort Hood to raise money from private contributors.

The cost of the new statue, which is about $18,000, was paid for through small donations from the soldiers of the 4th ID, according to Anderson.

Fuss and Anderson credited the soldiers’ generosity and Simpson’s vision for the lasting gift that, in the end, remembers fallen comrades.

“I think this is the best way we can honor their families and their memories,” Fuss said.

“Really that’s what it’s for – a tribute to all the soldiers over here that lost their lives,” Anderson said. “They will never be forgotten and they will always be heroes in our eyes.”
